The Native Americans actually welcomed the pale-skinned European visitors primarily out of curiosity than anything else. They were fascinated by the steel knives and swords, fire-spewing cannons, brass and copper utensils, etc., that these visitors brought with them. Eventually, cultural differences erupted. The natives could not stomach the arrogance of the newcomers and the scant respect they paid to nature. The European settlers viewed every resource — plants, animals, and people as something to be commercially exploited. The Native Indians were vastly outnumbered in the wars which ensued. The resistance they put up never proved enough to stop the European settlers. The nomadic lifestyle of the Indians, the relatively unsophisticated weapons at their disposal, the unwillingness of some of their own people to defend themselves, and the diseases of the white men — all contributed to the virtual elimination of their race. Some of the diseases brought by Europeans from their overcrowded cities decimated the natives.

1. Why did the Native Americans feel attracted towards the European visitors?
2. Which were the things in the hands of the European settlers that fascinated the natives?
3. What were the first things the Native Americans resented about the White settlers?
4. How did the Europeans view the resources of nature?
5. What effect did the diseases brought by the colonisers have on the natives?
